At some stage in the next few weeks I will be trying to commit Marco Zec's vimage code to -current. (only 'trying' not for technical reasons, but political).

Why now?
The code is in a shape where teh compiled out version of hte system is stable. In the compiled in version, it is functional enough to provide nearly all of what people want. It needs people with other interests to adapt it to their purposes and use it so that it can become a solid product for future releases.

The website has a snapshot with a date over a month old and many comments about unstable interfaces. I've seen zero reports of substantial testing...

What about locking and SMP scalability? Any new choke points?

not that I've seen.

Re: warning of pending commit attempt.

That's a less than resounding endorsement :)
