This is an automatic response: the recipient has not received your message.

If you were trying to make a personal contact with the intended recipient, you have probably replied to a Usenet posting which has a spam-protected reply email address. Somewhere in that posting (probably in the .signature at the end) there will be instructions on how to mail the real address of its poster. Sorry for the inconvenience! Blame the spammers for causing people to go to these lengths.

On the other hand, if you were trying to send spam (unsolicited bulk email) to this address, understand that it is utterly unwelcome, and has been utterly ignored, too. The recipient of your spam wishes your business all the success it deserves, given its current marketing strategy. Which is to say, none at all.
